Chapter VI: AL-MASTUDI ON THE BYZANTINES

1. Introductory

Of all non-Islamic polities the Byzantine Empire held a special place for Muslims. The Byzantines were not a mere foreign nation beyond the frontiers of Islam; but ever since the beginning of the Islamic conquests the Byzantines became the chief military adversary of the Arabs. It is true that by the mid 3rd century AH/mid 9th century AD the earlier hopes of universal conquest were no longer feasible. In fact a state of co-existence with the Byzantines was more or less conceded in practice, but, of course, not in theory. Although Arab-Byzantine frontiers had become more or less stabilized (before the period that concerns us here), yet annual war-fare or seasonal raiding remained the main characteristic of Arab Byzantine relations.1 In Arabic sources and in the thought-world of Muslims, Byzantium or the land of the Rûm was the "house of war" par excellence.

Arab authors before al-Mastudi: historians, geographers and men of letters, despite their obvious interest in the Byzantines as the enemy of Islam, show very little or no interest in the Byzantines as a people in their own right. Thus earlier Muslim histories give a brief account of the early Roman emperors but they all terminate their accounts with the reign of Heraclius at the time of the rise of Islam. After that the history of the Eastern Roman Empire is of no further interest to them. Henceforth the Byzantines figure only as the enemy; and the occasional mention of a Byzantine emperor or other personage.
is usually only in the context of Islamic–Byzantine warfare. As a rule the 'King of the Rûm' is not named, sometimes he is given the epithet 'tyrant' (isphya) or 'dog' (kalb) of the Rûm. It is noteworthy that even Christian historians who flourished in the Muslim world and wrote in Arabic did not include in their works a continuous account or even a list of Byzantine rulers after the Islamic conquests. (Although they do sometimes name emperors and mention certain events in Byzantium, and as Christians, they took special interest in the affairs of the Byzantine Church.)

Arabic geographers offer a different type of information on Byzantium. Ibn Khurrahaddîbheh and Qudāmâ wrote about the administrative and military conditions of the Byzantine Empire, particularly on the military officials and the themes. Despite the value of their information and the fact that both writers were important men of letters it is evident that their interest as well as their main sources of information on Byzantium were directly related to the strategic needs of the Islamic State. Both writers were state officials - Ibn Khurrahaddîbheh was head of the Postal Department which included the intelligence service, and Qudāmâ was a state-secretary responsible for the revenues. Qudāmâ explicitly states that he gives an account of Byzantine lands because the Muslims should guard against the Byzantines more than any other enemy. Other Muslim geographers who wrote before al-Mas'ūdî, most of whom were state officials such as Ibn Rusta, Ibn al-Fāqîh and al-Ya'qūbî, do not give any systematic treatment of Byzantine lands. (Ibn Rusta only preserves an account of the prisoner Harūn b Yahyâ on Constantinople.)

This preoccupation with their own lands is equally true of the Muslim geographers who flourished in the time of al-Mas'ūdî and shortly after. This is explicitly stated by al-Iṣâkî, Ibn Hawqi and al-Maqdîsî (or al-Muqaddasi). Al-Maqdîsî remarks that "we do not deal with non-Muslim countries for we have not seen them, and because there is no benefit from writing about them, anyway", but adds that "we do mention the conditions of Muslims in those lands." He has something to say about Constantinople - "for there is a special quarter for the Muslims ... which adjoins the palace of the 'dog' of the Rûm." Further examples could be added.

In other types of early Arabic literary works there are very few references and allusions to the Byzantines as such. It is true that the Byzantines were considered in Arabic literary circles to belong to the category of civilized nations, alongside Arabs, Persians and Indians.

But there was a tendency to belittle the achievements of the Byzantines and to pick up and often exaggerate the weak points in their way of life. For example, they were generally considered as adept in crafts but not in philosophy or the sciences; and the practice of castrating their children is stressed and reproached; they are also accused of carelessness as regards hygiene. The historical and cultural connections between the Byzantines and the ancient Greeks, although vaguely realized by certain scholars (especially those versed in philosophy and medicine) were nevertheless ignored, sometimes even categorically denied. The dialectic and polymath al-Iṣâkî (d 859) states that the Greeks (al-Yûnîq) were a nation that had long vanished like the ancient Aramaic tribe of Thamûd. He was anxious to deny that the Byzantines belonged to the same people as the ancient Greek philosophers whom he admired.

It is evident that the picture of the Byzantines given in Arabic literature is not only confused but also sometimes deliberately distorted. Despite the requirements of diplomacy on an official level, and notwithstanding partial recognition of Byzantine cultural qualities, the general attitude of Muslims was characterized by a belief in the superiority and self-sufficiency of their own religion and civilization. In the eyes of Islamic authors it was important and necessary to know about the Byzantines as the enemy with whom Muslims were at war. It was not felt necessary or even worthwhile to inquire about the Byzantines as people in their own right.

Al-Mas'ûdî presents a striking exception in the way in which he treats the history and affairs of the Byzantines. This is reflected in his systematic account on Byzantium; the wide range of his information on its geography, history, religion and culture; in his extensive use of Christian sources and his personal inquiries into Byzantine matters; and above all in his fair attitude of mind.

2 Scope and Sources

Al-Mas'ûdî devotes considerable space in both the Murûj and Tanbih to the history and contemporary conditions of the East Roman Empire. The Tanbih, though much smaller in size, contains a fuller treatment of Byzantium where the political history is updated to the time of writing (345/960), and a number of errors which occurred in the earlier account of the Murûj were amended. The Tanbih includes in addition a description of the land of Byzantium, an account of the ransom of prisoners between Muslims and Byzantines, and on the whole
More important is al-Masʿūdī's use of histories written by Christians. In his Murūj he alludes, without specifying, to some Christian histories which he consulted, especially among the Melkites, and states that he saw Christian chronicles in the Byzantine church of Antioch. In the Tanbih he names some Christian writers whose works were known to him. The earliest of these is a book by an Egyptian monk from Alexandria named Annianus. E. Honigmann has shown that this is the same Annianus who lived in the fifth century AD and whose chronicle was utilized by later Eastern Christian historians like George Syncellus, Elias Nisiarius, Ibn al-ʿIbri (Bar Hebraeus) and Michael the Syrian. In fact al-Masʿūdī's description of Annianus' chronicle agrees with what Michael the Syrian will have to say about it much later, namely that it was a "chronicle of world history from Adam to Constantine the Great". Al-Masʿūdī does not say whether he used an Arabic translation of this chronicle or whether he was able to consult it in the original (presumably Greek) language. He seems to have known something about the Greek language and he uses a few Greek terms, and in one instance he even attempts to transcribe a word or two in the Greek script. It is however doubtful whether he could read Greek on his own. He does, however, state in a general way that he 'consulted' some Greek works. Speaking of the Roman emperors before Constantine the Great, he indicates that their names and length of their reigns were variously given in the histories of the Melkite Christians, "most of which are in Greek: but we have related of these what was possible for us to describe". Al-Masʿūdī may have relied on the services of some bilingual person for the purpose of translation or at least perusal - perhaps a Christian priest, a Greek convert to Islam, or an inhabitant of the frontier region. Elsewhere he states that he sought assistance of this kind in reading a Syriac inscription in Harran. This practice of seeking the aid of a bi-lingual (especially in the case of Greek) was not uncommon among those Muslim authors who shared al-Masʿūdī's type of intellectual curiosity.

The majority of the Christian sources used by al-Masʿūdī were, however, written in Arabic. He consulted works written by representatives of various Christian churches: Melkites as well as Jacobites, Nestorians and Maronites. He names two major works written by two contemporary Melkite priests: The Patriarch of Alexandria, Saʿīd (Eutychius) b. al-Bītīrīq (d 940) whom he knew personally, and the Bishop of Manbij Maḥbūb (Agaphius) b. Qaṣṭānīnī al-Manbījī (wrote circa 942). Both of these works are still preserved; though that of al-Manbījī only in an incomplete form. Eutychius' history is entitled al-Kitāb al-Majmūʿ ʿalā al-Tanbih wa l-Taqdīq (the Book that is carefully and faithfullu put together). It is a 'universal' history from the creation until the year 328/438. As the book stands now it is divided into two sections: the first of which deals with biblical and Christian history up to the reign of Heraclius and the Muslim conquests; the second is devoted to Muslim history with only few and occasional references to Byzantine affairs.

Manbūj’s book, entitled Kitāb al-'Uṣūn, is also a ‘universal’ history written more or less along similar lines. In its preserved form it goes only as far as the second year of the reign of the Abū ʿAshaʿid Caliph al-Mahdā (that is 160/777).

It is possible to trace actual quotations from either of these works in al-Masʿūdī’s accounts, although certain borrowings are discernible. This is particularly so in connection with the pre-Islamic period of Byzantine history. It is possible for example to point to certain cases where al-Masʿūdī appears to be summarising details from Eutychius or from Agapōs; although there are some differences between his accounts and those of the two Christian historians. For example al-Masʿūdī spells the names of some emperors, patriarchs or other persons differently from the way they are spelt by Eutychius or Agapōs, and the lengths of reigns in his account differ sometimes. Al-Masʿūdī, however, does not include certain details found in Eutychius or Agapōs - especially those dealing with miracles and lives of saints, with consecration of patriarchs and bishops, or with certain theological disputes on which the two Melkite priests expounded their own views.

On the other hand, he includes some details that are not to be found in either of the two Christian authors’ accounts - for example two non-Christian traditions relating to the Conversion of Constantine the Great and to the apostasy of the Emperor Julian. There are also some details which he probably derived from non-Melkite Christian authorities.

He does in fact allude to three books on world history including Byzantine and Church history written by three non-Melkite scholars or priests; one of these was a Jacobite priest whom he knew personally and whose name is given as Abū Zakariyya ʿAbdallāh; the second was a Nestorian secretary (Kāshib), named Yaʿqūb b Zakariyya ʿAbd al-Kasārī (after Kaskar in northern Syria); and the third a Maronite scholar named by al-Masʿūdī as Qays al-Mārinī. It is not possible to determine al-Masʿūdī’s indebtedness to any of these non-Melkite authors, for their works are not known to have survived. However, it appears that his information on the three Christian Churches of the Jacobites, Maronites and Nestorians and their respective positions as regards theological controversies, was on the whole derived from representatives of those churches.

The sources of al-Masʿūdī’s account on Byzantine history after the rise of Islam cannot be easily determined. A comparison between this account and the scanty information available in the preserved works of Eutychius and Agapōs shows very few similarities. The two Christian historians paid very little attention to the affairs of Byzantium in this period. Although they include, now and then, some information relating to the accession of an emperor or the consecration of a Patriarch in Constantinople, this is not done systematically. It is true that some of the errors in al-Masʿūdī’s less developed account in Murūj, are to be found also in the work of Eutychius and can therefore be ascribed to his use of this work or of a common source.

Al-Masʿūdī’s additional information on Byzantine history after the rise of Islam, particularly the account in Tanbih, must be attributed to other sources. It is an open question whether some of this information goes back to the non-Melkite historians already cited. But if the Melkite Eutychius and Agapōs had little to say on Byzantine history after the Islamic conquests, the non-Melkite historians would have had even less.

The impressive details and the generally accurate chronology given in al-Masʿūdī’s Tanbih suggest that he must have utilized further sources. This would also raise the question of whether he may have made use of Byzantine sources - books or reports that may have found their way to the Islamic side, perhaps through an ambassador, a convert, a prisoner of war or a merchant coming from Constantinople. The scarcity of details about events in Byzantium which is reflected in the preserved works of other Islamic historians cannot be attributed simply to unavailability of information in the Muslim world about such events. As al-Masʿūdī’s works clearly demonstrate the question is not merely one of existence of information, but rather of curiosity and attitude of mind. There is evidence, for example, that at least a list of Byzantine emperors up to Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos (913-969) was available in Baghādād soon after the beginning of the latter’s reign, probably sometime before 306/918. Al-Masʿūdī’s younger contemporary, Ḥan ḡa ʿ al-Majmūʿ wrote the 350/961), who preserves this list, tells us that he copied it from a book written by a Baghādād judge called Wāḥīd. Significantly enough, Wāḥīd is quoted by Ḥan ḡa as stating that he had obtained this list from a book (or perhaps a letter: Kāshib) of the Byzantine Emperor, and that it was translated into Arabic by a certain Secretary (Baʿd al-kutṭāb). There is little doubt that this was the same Walī (d 306/919) who was personally known to al-Masʿūdī himself, and whose book, al-Sharīḥ (now lost) is mentioned in the bibliographical introduction of Murūjī. Thus it seems that al-Masʿūdī utilized this same list. However, Walī’s account as preserved by Ḥamza is only a bare list of rulers with the length of their reigns. On the other hand, al-Masʿūdī, as will be seen, gives more details about the same emperors, about political events in Constantinople, and Byzantine foreign relations. His information on these and other details must be attributed to other sources.

Al-Masʿūdī’s knowledge of the land of the Byzantines, the sea routes to their capital and main ports, was derived from a variety of sources different from the ones so far discussed. This includes earlier and contemporary written works as well as oral sources of information. Al-Masʿūdī was familiar with earlier Arabic geographical works, which contained valuable information on the administration of the Byzantine Empire, such as the works of Ibn Khurraḍāfshāh and Qudāma. Similarities and differences between al-Masʿūdī’s account and the extant works of these authors will be indicated further below. More important in this connection is his use of the works (now lost) of an earlier Arabic writer – namely Muslim b Abī Muslim al-Jarmī, who wrote around the middle of the 3rd/9th century. The works of al-Jarmī were also used by Ibn Khurraḍāfshāh and Qudāma and the common details between the accounts of these two writers and that of al-Masʿūdī may in part be attributed to this fact.

According to al-Masʿūdī himself, who is incidentally our only known source on al-Jarmī’s life and works, al-Jarmī was a Muslim warrior of the Syrian marches who was captured by the Byzantines and subsequently ransomed in the year 231/645. Al-Masʿūdī describes him as having been "an eminent man in the frontier region", and "well acquainted with the lands of the Byzantines on which he wrote a number of books (or reports)". Al-Jarmī’s works, as al-Masʿūdī indicates, dealt with the political history as well as with the administrative and military matters such as the way in which Muslim raids should be conducted and the recommended seasons for such raids. Al-Jarmī’s writings also included information on the northern neighbours of Byzantium in his day, such as the Avars, Bulgars, Khazars and Slavs. It is possible that much of al-Masʿūdī’s account on the description of Asia Minor and Byzantine themes was derived from the works of al-Jarmī.

Al-Masʿūdī also refers in a general way to works dealing mainly with Muslim–Byzantine warfare. Such books, or perhaps manuals, whose authors are not named by him, are described as Kutub al-Sawā’il; literally "books of summer expeditions". It seems that these manuals not only described raids against the Byzantines, but also, as al-Masʿūdī indicates, included accounts of ransoming of prisoners. Presumably written for the use of Muslim warriors and based on such reports as the works of al-Jarmī and other material available for the Muslim war intelligence service, these manuals also contained information on routes, fortresses, the topography of Asia Minor and the approaches to Constantinople.

Of particular significance is al-Masʿūdī’s personal inquiries, especially in the thughūr region, where he was able to obtain valuable information, from knowledgeable persons, on aspects of the Byzantine Empire. His inquiries among different individuals is in line with his practice of seeking information on lands which he did not personally visit, or recent events on which no written sources were available. Al-Masʿūdī’s informants on Byzantine matters were on the whole well-placed individuals from whom he derived first hand information on geographical details, or recent developments. It is significant to note that they included prominent Muslims and converted Byzantines, and possibly a Byzantine diplomat. Among these were Muslim naval admirals and sailors, other Muslim warriors, and dignitaries of the thughūr, ex-prisoners of war, Byzantine converts, and merchants who visited Byzantine lands.

Of these knowledgeable informants al-Masʿūdī mentions a few by name. One of these is a certain 'Abd Allāh b Walī whom he describes as the master of the port of Jabala – near Laodicea on the north Syrian coast, who was an old admiral and had considerable experience of naval warfare against the Byzantines. Al-Masʿūdī adds concerning this man: "there is no other living person at this date, 332 AH (= 944 AD) better acquainted with the Mediterranean, or more senior in years than he is; nor can any sea captain or sailor deny his knowledge, piety, or experience in the jihād in this sea". It is curious that the activities and even the name of this Muslim admiral are not mentioned by other known Arabic sources.

An important Muslim admiral from whom al-Masʿūdī obtained information on Byzantine matters was a well-known Byzantine convert to Islam. This was no less than Leo of Tripoli whose name is given by al-Masʿūdī as Abū ʿl-Ḥārith Lawī or Lawūn, the page (ghulūm) of Zarqa, 54 This man who came originally from the Byzantine port of Atalia, 55 attained a high position in the Muslim navy and was, according to al-Mas'udi, the master of the Syrian port of Tripoli. He is known for his naval operations against the Byzantines, especially his spectacular expedition in which he sacked Thessalonica in 293/904. 56 Al-Mas'udi mentions this admiral in Tripoli sometime "after 300 AH/913 AD" as he puts it. 57 Leo is believed to have perished in a subsequent naval expedition in 921 or 922 AD. 58 Al-Mas'udi is the only known Arabic author to give both the Arabic kunya: Abū l-Kāthir and the original Greek name of this admiral: Lēo or Lēun (Leo). Other Arabic sources refer to him simply as "the page of Zarqa", 59 or in one case give his adopted Arabic name, Rashīq al-Wardānī. 60 Although al-Mas'udi only gives him details concerning the Mediterranean Sea, 61 it may be presumed that he also obtained some historical information from him and from his crew. It is probably thanks to his acquaintance with this admiral and some of his sailors that al-Mas'udi was able to record certain details of the expedition against Thessalonica and to realize the importance of this city. 62

An even more important personage from the Islamic-Byzantine marches was the Arab warrior and diplomat, Abū 'Umāyra Tādhī b Ḍahlān b ʿAbd al-Baqī. Abū 'Umāyar was the chief of the frontier town of Adana for almost half a century (until his death in 337/949). 63 He came from a celebrated family of the tribe of Tamūm, 64 and was considered as the "shaykh" of the Syrian marches and the one most highly regarded and obeyed among his fellow men. 65 He was bi-lingual and his fluency in Greek and the prestige of his family, gained him an important position as the official entrusted to accompany Byzantine envoys to Baghdad 66 or Damascus, 67 and as Muslim ambassador to Constantinople on several occasions, 68 in addition to his responsibility in the tağhūr. Abū 'Umāyar was also a distinguished man of learning - who besides his knowledge of the traditional Muslim sciences, was an authority on the history and lore of Arab-Byzantine warfare. 69 Al-Mas'udi mentions Abū 'Umāyar more than once between 309/921 and 334/948. He describes him as "the shaykh of the Syrian marches (Shaykh al-taghūr al-shāmīya) in the past and in our own day" and as "highly esteemed among his people" as well as "a learned man". This latter quality of Abū 'Umāyar accords him a special, if brief mention in one or two Arabic biographical works devoted to Muslim scholars. 70 Abū 'Umāyar's knowledge of the history of Arab-Byzantine relations and diplomacy, of Byzantine lands and of the Byzantine capital was thus based on first hand knowledge and experience. His knowledge and interest in the traditions of the frontier marches must have been further enriched by the fact that he belonged to a family with a long and distinguished record in warfare and diplomacy and in the administration of the important frontier town of Adana and possibly also Tarsus. These qualities and his first-hand acquaintance with the Byzantine capital and imperial court made Abū 'Umāyar perhaps the most important and reliable of al-Mas'udi's o authorial authorities on Constantinople and the routes to it, and on recent events in the Byzantine Empire. As will be seen, al-Mas'udi actually quotes him on geographical, topographical and historical matters. 71 It may well be that much of al-Mas'udi's information on recent events in Constantinople are due to this old Arab diplomat.

Al-Mas'udi may have also obtained further knowledge of contemporary Byzantium and its civilization, through the arrival of an important Byzantine envoy in Damascus during one of al-Mas'udi's sojourns there in 334/946. He may even have met this envoy and thus encountered an official representative of the Byzantines and their culture. Al-Mas'udi himself tells us that this Greek ambassador arrived in Damascus during the month of Dhu'l-Qa'da 334 AH/July 946 AD. Accompanied by the same Abū 'Umāyar b ʿAbd al-Baqqi, he was presented to the Muslim master of Egypt and Syria at the time, Muhammad b ʿUthmān al-Ikhshīdī (who died soon after that). Al-Mas'udi also tells us that when the Byzantine envoy and Abū 'Umāyar arrived in Damascus "I was in the city that day". 72 It is just possible that al-Mas'udi may have met this diplomat then. Such a meeting could have been arranged by Abū 'Umāyar who was in charge of the movements of the envoy; moreover al-Mas'udi tells us elsewhere that he had access to the court of al-Ikhshīdī. 73 Whether or not al-Mas'udi met this diplomat - it is certain that he was able to form some fairly good idea about him and what his country was like. This is reflected in the manner in which he gives his full name and titles as Yūnās al-Andalūsī al-Batrīqūs al-Maṣūdī al-Mutarrārahī (John the proconsul, Patrician, mystic and ascetic). The manner in which al-Mas'udi transliterates the name and Greek titles of this envoy into Arabic is remarkable. So is his description of him as "a man of insight and understanding (wa hāna dhārā'īn wa fasāhīn)." 74

The identity of this envoy can be tentatively suggested. It is evident that al-Mas'udi is not here confusing, as thought by some scholars, between John 'Mysticus' and the 'Domesticus' John Curcus the well-known army general, (active 923-944). 75 It is clear that al-Mas'udi's description perfectly fits an actual John Mysticus who is known to have been created Patrician and Anthypatus (proconsul) as early as April 10th, 325; and to have been already active in the Byzantine diplomatic service earlier in 924, when he accompanied the Patriarch Nicholas Mystikus on his visit to the Bulgars Symeon; and who after a successful but short career as the Chief Foreign Secretary was removed from court (925). Although the Emperor Romanus continued for a while to have recourse to his sound judgement and resolution, John was soon forced by circumstances to flee to a monastery and become a monk. It would appear that after the fall of Romanus Lecapenus (944), John Mystikus recovered his former position under Constantine Porphyrogenitus.

Al-Mas'udī's informants also included "some of our brethren who had been prisoners of war in the land of the Byzantines"; a certain Byzantine who had embraced Islam and become a good Muslim, "certain merchants who traded between Constantinople and the ports of Syria and Egypt," It is evident that al-Mas'udī did not simply come across information on Byzantium in an incidental manner. His accounts reflect his genuine attempt to acquire knowledge and to verify reports by inquiry and constant questioning. Al-Mas'udī may to a large extent be justified in his statement concerning the manner in which he sought to obtain information on internal events in Byzantium - he speaks of "... our proximity to their [the Byzantines'] country, our inquiry into their akhbār (history and news) and our frequent movement between the Syrian marches, Antioch, [other parts of] Syria, and Egypt".

Al-Mas'udī's information on the Byzantine Empire covers diverse aspects. He tries first to explain who the Rūm were and why they were thus named, and records more than one opinion concerning this. He gives the views of earlier Arabic genealogists who linked the Rūm with a certain personage of the same name and with biblical genealogy. But in accordance with his general approach when dealing with non-Islamic peoples he prefers the view which was, as he puts it, "held by the Rūm themselves", namely that "they were named after their city of Rūmīyya, which is known in their language as Rūmānī, i.e., Rome. He realized that the Byzantines called themselves Rūmīyyas and the people of the frontier region knew them only by this name." This is, of course, the Arabic transcription of Romanos, the singular form of Romaioi (i.e., Romans) which is indeed the name the Byzantines applied to themselves. He also knew that the name of the city of Rūmīyya (Rome) was in turn derived from its legendary founders, and earliest kings: "Romulus and Remus the twin sons of the she-wolf". Al-Mas'udī also points out that the land of the Byzantines was called by them Rūmīyya (Romania). He compares this to the name Siyār (Syria) which they applied to al-Shām and which is related to the name of the Syrians.

3 The land of the Byzantines

Al-Mas'udī's account of the Byzantine themes, though showing similarities to earlier Muslim accounts by Ibn Khurrasādibheh, Qudāma and Ibn al-Faṣḥ b, nevertheless contains more details and shows considerable divergence. It is true that he followed the view expressed by other Muslim writers to the effect that the Byzantine Empire was always divided into fourteen military provinces (i.e., themes) - an idea which probably goes back to the works of al-Jarmī. A comparison between al-Mas'udī's list of Byzantine military provinces and the earliest preserved lists of Ibn Khurrasādibheh, Qudāma, and Ibn al-Faṣḥ b, indicates that he made better use of the works of al-Jarmī, and probably consulted other sources for this purpose.

Al-Mas'udī designates a Byzantine theme by the term Band (plural binid) probably from the Greek bēνίδον which denoted a small military division smaller than a theme. He however uses this term to denote a proper theme and employs the Arabic term amāl to describe a smaller military unit. It is interesting that al-Mas'udī draws an analogy between the Byzantine themes and the Islamic system of the sīnad (singular jund), which was especially prevalent in Syria. He does not however elaborate on this, but he does point out that the Byzantine themes were much larger in size than the Islamic sīnad.

Al-Mas'udī's account differs from earlier Arabic lists mainly in two respects. It is arranged in a considerably different order - whereas the earlier lists begin with European themes, al-Mas'udī's survey starts by enumerating the Asiatic provinces. And it contains three more themes which are not mentioned by Ibn Khurrasādibheh, Ibn al-Faṣḥ b or Qudāma. These earlier Arabic writers list eleven Asiatic and three European themes. Al-Mas'udī states that there were nine Asiatic themes "on this side of the straits: Dīn al-Khalīfī, but he actually mentions eleven Asiatic themes, three of which he regards as small military divisions. Thus he describes the Charsianon (Kharsa- an), Colonien (Qalūyān) and Solouqon (Sulūyān) as small units, respectively within the larger themes of the Armeniaca, Paplagonia and a third theme which he calls Decapolis (Dīqāhālīf) or Banīyās. This latter which is not mentioned by earlier Arabic writers, probably corresponds to the Cibyracots theme of Byzantine sources. Colonea is not mentioned by either Ibn Khurradadhbih, Qudāma or Ibn al-Faqih. On the other hand, al-Mas'ūdī omits the theme of Chaldia known to his predecessors. Whereas these earlier lists mention three European themes, Thrace, Macedonia and the enigmatic Ṭablā, al-Mas'ūdī gives five: adding the two important themes of the Peloponnese and Thessalonica. Thus he in fact names seventeen themes, although in his list three of these are considered as sub-units within other themes.

With one exception the themes listed by al-Mas'ūdī are all identifiable with themes known from Byzantine sources. This exception is the so-called Ṭablā or Ṭablā which is supposed to have comprised Constantinople and its environs. But this has been shown to be most probably based on a misunderstanding, and no theme with such a name seems to be mentioned by Byzantine authors. The other themes in al-Mas'ūdī's list are all mentioned by Constantine Prophyllogennus in his treatise on the themes with the exception of two of them: Cappadocia and Charaxian which are missing from the emperor's work "(for no apparent reason)".

Al-Mas'ūdī's list of Byzantine themes however does not represent actual conditions in the Empire at the time of his writing the Tanbih (345/956). In fact, at the beginning of the tenth century (ie before al-Mas'ūdī wrote any of his extant works) there were in the Byzantine Empire no less than thirty military provinces (themes).

Modern specialists who studied the Byzantine administrative system emphasize the fact that the origins of the theme system, which had been already overshadowed by the Exarchates, go back to the seventh century and most probably to the reign of Heraclius (610–641). It has also been shown that the organization of the various themes was undertaken under several Byzantine emperors and "had been brought to a conclusion by the end of the ninth and the beginnings of the tenth centuries". "As a result of the gradual division of the original large themes into smaller ones and the introduction of the system into new regions the number of themes had considerably increased". This historical development was not perceived by al-Mas'ūdī or other Muslim authors.

This fact may be partly explained in the context of a notion among Arabic writers according to which the Byzantine Empire was always divided into 'fourteen' military provinces, a division which was wrongly thought to have been both old and final. It may, however, have been due also to lack of information available to these authors. It is noteworthy that the two European themes of the Peloponnese and Thessalonica - listed by al-Mas'ūdī but wanting in other Arabic lists - were already established as early as the beginning of the ninth century (ie before Ibn Khurradadhbih or Qudāma or even al-Jarri wrote). Charaxian and Seleucia which are considered by al-Mas'ūdī as smaller units are actually known to have been created originally, together with Cappadocia, as small military units, most probably under Theophylactus (829–842) forming three frontier zones or 'mountain passes', kēistrai. But in the early tenth century the three zones appear as themes in Byzantine sources. Thus al-Mas'ūdī's inclusion of Cappadocia as a theme reflects the new status of this province. He does not, however, note a similar position in the case of Charaxian and Seleucia. Similarly al-Mas'ūdī's description of Colonea as a small military unit ('amal, ie kleisura) does not in fact reflect its actual rank. For Colonea was a theme with a Strategos as early as 883.

Al-Mas'ūdī's account of the land of Byzantium is not confined to the military and administrative aspects. Unlike some earlier Arabic writers (eg Ibn Khurradadhbih, Ibn al-Faqih and Qudāma), he includes no information on the hierarchy, numbers or finance of the Byzantine military organization. He is mainly concerned with geographical matters: thus he enumerates the crossing points from the Asian side to Constantinople, gives a description of the straits of the Hellespont, the Sea of Marmara and the Bosphorus, and offers some information on the Byzantine capital itself. These details, most of which are not found in the earlier Arabic accounts of Ibn Khurradadhbih, Qudāma or Ibn al-Faqih, are probably based partly on the lost works of al-Jarri, but perhaps more so on oral sources such as Muslim prisoners, warriors, sailors and envoys to Constantinople.

He gives an original description of the routes on the Asiatic side from which it was possible to reach Constantinople by sea or at which passengers or armies sailing from the capital could land.

Al-Mas'ūdī's description of the sea route to Constantinople is largely based on accounts of Muslim naval captains and reports of envoys who reached the capital itself. He actually quotes Abū 'Umayr b 'Abd al-Hāfiqī, the leading frontier dignitary and sometime Muslim envoy to Constantinople mentioned above. The account of Abū 'Umayr is related to a description of the Sea of Marmara and the Bosphorus (the two are, as a rule, collectively denoted by the term 'Khālid al-Qustānīyya' (Gulf or Bay of Constantinople). Al-Mas'ūdī states that - nople is however not only meagre but also misleading. He states that in size "it is as large as Baṣra or even smaller". On its fortifications he remarks that "it is fortified just like other cities, and protected only by a single wall, no more". He thought that only one side of the city faced the sea. The rest of his remarks are concerned with the residence of Muslim prisoners and their conditions there. In such accounts even the most outstanding features of the Byzantine capital are not apparent.

Al-Maṣʿūdī's brief description of Constantinople though using some information from earlier Arabic authors, offers correctives for certain prevalent misconceptions, and adds fresh details. His account deals with several aspects of the Byzantine capital, thus giving a clearer picture of it to Muslim contemporaries. Moreover in his description one notes the absence of any prejudice or any attempt at distortion.

It is noteworthy that al-Maṣʿūdī knew several names for the Byzantine capital. The name that is most frequently used by him is al-Qustantiniyya (i.e Constantinople) which, with very few exceptions, was the only name of the city known to other Arabic authors. He also knew that the ancient name of the city was Byzantium (Bysantīyīt) - a term which he also employs to denote environs of the capital. It is quite remarkable that al-Maṣʿūdī uses two descriptions which were usually given to Constantinople by the Byzantines themselves. One is the description malikat al-muchn (i.e 'queen of cities' Μακάλλης τούλιος) commonly applied to Constantinople as early as the fourth century (e.g. Eusebius) and until later times, and which he may have known from a Byzantine informant or perhaps from a written Christian source.

Perhaps even more significant is his knowledge of yet a fourth appellation applied to their capital by the Byzantines. He states that "in our days the Rum called it Δουλα (Τόλιον) or Dolon (Πόλιον) and when they wish to refer to it as their greatest city they would say "Istanbūlīn" (Πόλιον). The Byzantines in fact often referred to their capital as 'the City'. Al-Maṣʿūdī must have heard this term applied to Constantinople from a Byzantine person or from a Muslim who knew the Greek language and the Byzantine usage. This information preserved by al-Maṣʿūdī constitutes a fairly early piece of evidence - actually the earliest known in Islamic sources to correct a general misconception and to show that the name 'Istanbul' was not after all entirely a later name given to Constantinople by the Ottomans.\textsuperscript{121}

As for the geographical location of the Byzantine capital, al-Mas\textsuperscript{s}d\textsuperscript{i} states that "Constantinople stands on the western side of the Khali[\textit{ie} the Bosphorus] and is bound by water from three sides, and from the west it is connected with the mainland".\textsuperscript{122} He realizes that the Byzantine capital was in Europe: "Constantinople is in the great landmass (\textit{al}-\textit{Ard al-Kabira}) which includes the land of Rome, \textit{al-Andalus} and the countries of the Franks, Slavs as well as other peoples of the north".\textsuperscript{123}

His description of the walls and gates of Constantinople and his reference to some of its buildings, although occasionally showing a lack of specific details, reflect a considerable knowledge. Thus he knew that on the western side, the city had more than one wall, which varied in height - a reference to the series of land-walls and fortifications built on the western side of Constantinople, first by Constantine the Great (324–337) and especially by Theodosius II (408–450). He describes the southern wall as being the highest. He accurately mentions that along the water of the Khali[\textit{ie}] the city had only one wall.\textsuperscript{124} In this case the term Khalij would obviously not only describe the Sea of Marmara and the Bosphorus as indicated above, but would also include the Golden Horn. He observes that there were numerous gates for the city: "It is said that it had thirty gates; some claim that there were a hundred gates large and small".\textsuperscript{125} But he specifically mentions the "Golden Gate" of the Theodosian fortifications.\textsuperscript{126}

His knowledge of some of the buildings in the Byzantine capital although wanting in specific details, nevertheless, indicates the right locations. For example, he remarks that "there was a palace adjoining the western wall", and another "palace with numerous towers and watch-towers in the direction of the Khalij[\textit{ie}]".\textsuperscript{127} The first palace may be identified with the Palace of Blachernae in the north-western part of the city, while the second probably refers to the Great Palace on the coast of the Sea of Marmara. He also notes that the city is "surrounded by numerous churches",\textsuperscript{128} which may be a general allusion to the many churches and monasteries known to have existed in the outer regions and suburbs of Constantinople.\textsuperscript{129}

He also observes that the climate of Constantinople was influenced by its geographical location which makes it subject to high humidity and changeable winds.\textsuperscript{130}

5 Byzantine History

Al-Mas\textsuperscript{s}d\textsuperscript{i}’s treatment of the history of the Byzantine Empire is equally significant; and certainly shows a living scholarly interest in its affairs. In his survey of Roman and Byzantine history, he distinguishes three main phases. The first is the period of the "Pagan (\textit{kwa\textsuperscript{s}ar}) or \textit{Sh\textsuperscript{3}ib} \textit{\textsuperscript{\textit{\textsuperscript{\textsuperscript{x}}}n}) Roman emperors whose capital was Rome",\textsuperscript{131} this contains a list of early Roman emperors to Diocletian (284–305). The second is what he calls the period of "the Christian Roman emperors of Constantinople" covering the reigns from Constantine the Great (324–337) to Heraclius (610–641).\textsuperscript{132} The third phase is actually a sub-division of the second, covering Byzantine history after the rise of Islam. Al-Mas\textsuperscript{s}d\textsuperscript{i} who alone among his earlier and contemporary Muslim (and also Christian Arabic) historians devotes an independent and systematic account to this period of Roman history - designates it as "the history of the Byzantine emperors after the rise of Islam",\textsuperscript{133} or "the history of the emperors of the \textit{Rum} from the \textit{Hijra} (622 AD) to the year 345 (956 AD)".\textsuperscript{134}

His account of the first of these periods (i.e Roman History up to the reign of Constantine the Great) is beyond the scope of this study. His treatment of the second period (Constantine to Heraclius), although admittedly it does not add to our present knowledge of this period, nevertheless deserves a brief consideration. It is mainly due to his extensive use of Christian sources that his remarkable accuracy in the survey of the successive emperors and the length of their reigns is maintained.
His lists in Tanbih as well as Muruj, containing twenty-two emperors, on the whole fits in with the number of imperial reigns in Constantinople in this period, and the same is true of the length of reigns.

Apart from its accuracy and sheer length in comparison to the earlier Muslim accounts, al-Mas'udi's treatment of this early period of Byzantine history has three further significant characteristics.
First, he places more emphasis on certain outstanding events or achievements, as for example the two most important undertakings of Constantine the Great (324-337): "his foundation of Constantinople - a city which he built and fortified and made his seat of government (dwar manjalakat in layh)"; and his adoption of Christianity. Another example is his reference to some of Justinian I's buildings.

Secondly, al-Mas'udi gives more attention to the affairs of the Christian Church in this period. He gives a detailed account of the first Six General Councils of the Church using the Creek term for Council (Sunudus or Sunhudas) which was used, as he states, by Christians in Syria and Egypt, and which he renders into Arabic by the words Majma' or Ijmama (Council or Assembly).
He deals with the position of the various emperors as regards Christianity pointing out the role they played in supporting a certain doctrine or suppressing another. In his description of the Christological controversies and the triumph of Orthodox (Melkite) doctrines, he shows an interest in details and reflects a deeper understanding of the importance of the Christian Church in the Eastern Roman Empire.

The third important aspect of al-Mas'udi's treatment of this period is his remarkable familiarity with non-Muslim sources and traditions. For his information not only testifies to his acquaintance with Christian sources representing the views of Melkites, Jacobites, Nestorians and Marcionites, but also shows his endeavour to incorporate the opinions of a non-Christian (and non-Muslim) party - namely the Sahians of Harran.
Thus in his treatment of the question of Con-stantine's conversion to Christianity he remarks that there was a controversy between Christians and Sahians regarding the circumstances of this event. He states that according to the Christians, Constantine saw an illuminated cross in the sky - "some say that the cross appeared to him in a vision, others claim that he actually witnessed it in daylight"; but in either case the Emperor was told: "seek victory with this and you shall conquer your enemy" - clearly a free translation of the well-known "in hoc signo vinces". He adds that in their opinion Constantine then adopted the cross as a sign on his standards, was victorious and as a result adopted Christianity. He then introduces the opinion of the Sahians which he most probably obtained from some of their scholars at Harra'N, that Constantine suffered "from leprosy . . .
and this according to their creed rendered the person who had it unsuitable for government . . . whereas Christianity does not ban such a man from becoming emperor". Similarly, al-Mas'udi gives the views of both Christians and Sahians on the apostasy of the Emperor Julian (361-363). He writes: "the Byzantines call him Muradus; he is Murtadac which means al-Murtad (the apostate); and the Sahians:
Usibius (Eusebius) meaning the 'faithful' or the 'pious'; all Christians, however, disassociate themselves from him, some of them call him al-Buztata (ie Apostates)."

Far more significant is al-Mas'udi's treatment of Byzantine history after the rise of Islam. He is the only known Arabic historian to undertake research (within the terms of his time and place) on this period of the history of the greatest and closest enemy of the Muslims.
It is evident that his knowledge of Byzantine affairs is based on various sources of information, both written and oral; and it would seem that it was oral information that most contributed to his knowledge of events which took place in Byzantium during his own lifetime.
The details which al-Mas'udi gives on Byzantine history, after the Islamic conquests indicate the type of knowledge available in the Muslim East about events in contemporary Byzantium and throw some light on certain aspects which most interested al-Mas'udi himself, such as contemporary history of non-Muslims, very recent events, and cultural aspects. His fair attitude towards non-Muslims is particularly re-lected here.

His account in the Tanbih contains an accurate list of successive emperors with the length of their reigns, corresponding more or less to the generally accepted Byzantine Chronology. It is perhaps noteworthy that whereas al-Mas'udi's list in the Muruj on this period of Byzantine history is rather confused and sometimes inaccurate his account in the Tanbih is more accurate, up to date, and all in all, more developed. It appears that when writing the Muruj al-Mas'udi could not find or establish an accurate chronological sequence and length of reigns of the East Roman emperors after the rise of Islam. In fact he begins his chapter dealing with this period of Byzantine history by indicating the confusion in Muslim chronicles and histories concerning the name of the Similarly he describes how the Empress Irene undertook to get rid of her son as partner on the throne, Constantine VI (780–97), by blinding him. He describes this episode in a way which shows great interest in and knowledge of details. He writes:

[Constantine VI's] policies were renounced by his subjects and his mother plotted against him aiming to retain the authority for herself. She ordered that a mirror be heated and that [Constantine] be hastily woken up from his sleep and closely confronted with the [hot] mirror; having opened his eyes so suddenly, he lost his sight. The period of his reign was seventeen years jointly with his mother, and then she ruled alone for five years. He also relates how Irene was forced to pay tribute to Harun al-Rashid, and that this caused anger against her and led to her overthrow by Nicephorus, the former logospathis (logothete) of the treasury, who was supported and backed by others. She was deposed in the year 137 (i.e., in 802), while she was in her own palace known as 夏合 al-habari (τὸ παλάτιον τοῦ Ἐκανθερίου) and with her was her counsellor al-γαπος (the eunuch Astius) who was a man of resolution and ability.

Al-Mas'ūdī's account of the reign of Nicephorus I (802–811) contains some interesting details which indicate an oral source of information; for some of these details reflect popular stories and do not precisely present known historical facts. For example, Nicephorus is credited with being the first Byzantine Emperor ever to wear a beard. It is however, known that a number of the late Roman or early Byzantine emperors were bearded — for example Julian (361–363), and Constantine IV (668–683). It is true that Julian the Apostate who is depicted with a long beard of a Greek philosopher had come to the throne after a succession of close-shaven emperors; and the long beard of Constantine IV was probably considered as unusual by his contemporaries who nicknamed him 'Pogonatus' (the bearded). But it is also known that most emperors from the seventh century onwards are represented with beards on Byzantine coins.

Al-Mas'ūdī also records a tradition, prevalent among contemporary Muslims, which considered Nicephorus I of Arab stock either from the Ghassanid house of Jafna or from another Christian Arab tribe, Iyūd. Al-Mas'ūdī adds that this emperor was said to have objected to the Byzantine practice of calling the Arabs by the abusive name of Ṣarrāqānīs (Ṣarqānīs, 'Saracens'), an appellation which according to al-Masʿūdī "meant the servants of Sarra - a defamatory reference to Hagar and her son Ismāʿīl (Ishmael), and that she was a slave-girl of Sarra". He adds that, despite Nicephorus's disapproval of this name, "the Byzantines still call the Arabs 'Saracens' to our own times". Al-Masʿūdī's knowledge of this Byzantine usage was no doubt due to his acquaintance with the frontier region and with a number of Muslim warlords and diplomats.

Al-Masʿūdī also states that Nicephorus I was the first Byzantine emperor to name his own son as his heir to the throne and to consider him as his co-emperor; and, adds, that the imperial correspondence during Nicephorus' reign was in the name of "Nicephorus and Staurakius: Kings of the Rūm". It is however known that earlier Byzantine emperors had appointed a son as co-emperor and heir to the throne in their own life-time, and therefore this institution was not really initiated by Nicephorus I.

Perhaps more interesting in this connection is al-Masʿūdī's statement that "the kings of the Rūm prior to Nicephorus' reign used to write in their correspondence 'from the king of Christendom', but Nicephorus wrote 'from the King of al-Rūm'". Al-Masʿūdī, who appears to consider this sudden change as a mere personal decision by Nicephorus, was obviously unaware of the significance of this change and its connection with the conflict between Byzantium and Charlemagne, the newly created Western Roman Emperor. However, al-Masʿūdī's statement is true in one sense, namely that after Nicephorus' reign the official title 'Emperor of the Romans' was almost always used. It is true that the Byzantines always considered their emperor as 'the Emperor of the Romans' and there is evidence of official, if rare, usage of this title prior to the days of Nicephorus I (for example the imperial seal of Leo III 717-744). But nevertheless it is recognized by modern scholars that "before 812 the title Basileus seldom appeared with the addition Ῥωμαίων and after 812 seldom appeared without this".

Among later events in Byzantium al-Masʿūdī mentions the conspiracy of Leo the Armenian whom he calls 'the Patriarch' (al-Bāṭīr) against Michael I Rangabe (811-813) which led to the deposition of the latter and the accession of Leo the Armenian (Leo V, 813-820). However, in summarizing the events which surrounded the subsequent downfall and murder of Leo V himself, al-Masʿūdī attributes the role of Michael the Amorian to the already deposed Michael Rangabe. Thus he states that Leo "detained his predecessor and made him suffer... then the followers of Michael plotted against [Leo] and freed Michael who assassinated Leo and regained the throne. It is said that Michael had become a monk during Leo's assumption of authority". As a result of this confusion al-Masʿūdī postulates a second reign of Michael I for nine years instead of the reign of the founder of the Amorian dynasty, Michael II (820-829).

Al-Masʿūdī also describes the circumstances in which Basil I 'The Macedonian' (867-886) was able to become emperor establishing a new dynasty. He relates how Basil originally came to seek his fortune in Constantinople and how his physical strength and courage as well as his knowledge in taming horses opened the way for him into the court of Michael III the Amorian (842-867). Al-Masʿūdī states that, "[Basil] had brought Basil over when he knew his qualities"; and that Basil "moved from one position of authority to another including that of Parjunum; this means the manager of the emperor's affairs then he killed his master and became the sole emperor". It is evident that al-Masʿūdī is here referring to the title of the Grand Chancellor (Paraxoinomenos) which Basil actually held in the imperial court, before Michael eventually made him his co-emperor. Al-Masʿūdī's understanding of the office of the Paraxoinomenos, although perhaps rather vague, is not altogether inaccurate. He uses the Arabic term (al-mudākkir al-Mulik or al-Muluk) and it is not clear whether this rendering is based on his knowledge of the theoretical function of the Grand Chamberlain (ie administration of the imperial household) or an awareness of the more considerable authority which Basil as Grand Chamberlain is known to have actually enjoyed.

Al-Masʿūdī describes Basil I as the Slav (al-Saglabā), and observes that he was so called after his mother who was a Slav - a tradition which was known to other Arabic historians. But it is noteworthy that al-Masʿūdī knew that Basil came originally from the European theme of Thrace, and realized that this Basil "was the grandfather of Constantine VII Porphyrogentius" son of Leo VI the Wise... the present emperor of the Byzantines at the time of the writing of this book (Tanbih) which is the year 966".

6 Recent History

Particularly interesting is al-Masʿūdī's account of internal events during the times of the Byzantine emperors who were his own contemporaries: Constantine VII Porphyrogennitus (913–959) and Romanus I Lecapenus (920–944) — especially the successive plots and palace coups which culminated in the final fall of the Lecapeni. The account given by al-Mas’udi illustrates not only his knowledge of contemporary events in Byzantium, but also his endeavour to obtain information on the most recent developments in Constantinople. Towards the end of his account on Byzantine history in that part of Murūj written in 332/944, al-Mas’udi remarks:

At present the kings of the Byzantines are three: the most senior and the one who actually administers the affairs is Romanus the Usurper (al-Mutaghallib); the second is Constantine son of Leo son of Basil, and the third king is a son of Romanus who is also addressed as king and his name is Stephen (Isidimus); Romanus has also made another son of his as the ‘master of the seat’ of Constantinople, that is the great Patriarch who directs their religious affairs; he had previously had him castrated, and attached him to the Church. Thus the affairs of the Byzantines in our time evolve round these above-named kings... Here ends the account of their history as we have mentioned; and God knows best what may become of them in future.¹⁸⁵

In the Tumah, written about ten years later, al-Mas’udi supplements his previous account and gives a fairly detailed description of the fates of these persons and their roles in subsequent events. He relates with vividness and considerable accuracy the main developments — elaborating on the usurpation of authority by Romanus, and describing the virtual confinement of Constantine Prophryrogenitus, the overthrow of Romanus by his two sons, Stephen and Constantine, the exile of the two young Lecapeni by their brother-in-law Constantine Prophryrogenitus and the final emergence of this latter as autocrat.¹⁸⁶

The details of this account appear to be based on more than one source. The information on the events leading to the two successive palace coups during the winter of 944–45, was most probably mainly derived from the Arab ambassador Abū ‘Umayr b ‘Abd al-Baqi‘, already mentioned.¹⁸⁷ Abū ‘Umayr was sent in 946 on a mission to Constantinople where in the month of May he was received by the emperor Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus himself who now was the actual emperor after the fall of the Lecapeni.¹⁸⁸ Abū ‘Umayr returned to Syria and was in Damascus in July of the same year, having brought with him a Byzantine envoy to complete the arrangements for a truce and a ransom of prisoners. Al-Mas’udi who records the arrival of Abū ‘Umayr and the Greek John Mysticus, was himself in Damascus at that time and met Abū ‘Umayr and, possibly also the Byzantine envoy.¹⁸⁹

Al-Mas’udi’s account, however, contains details of some later developments which took place after the return of Abū ‘Umayr from the Byzantine capital and even after Abū ‘Umayr’s death.¹⁹⁰ For example, al-Mas’udi knew that Romanus Lecapenus had since died after having spent four years in a monastery (948),¹⁹¹ that one of his two exiled sons, Constantine Lecapenus, was killed on another island where he had been exiled and his head was sent to Constantinople where his brother-in-law the Emperor Constantine Prophryrogenitus expressed sorrow at his death,¹⁹² he also knew that Stephen, the other exiled son of Romanus, was still alive on yet another island at the time of writing (956).¹⁹³ Information about these later events was obtained, al-Mas’udi himself states, ‘from envoys (rusul) and merchants coming from Constantinople and arriving by boat at Fustat in Egypt’.¹⁹⁴

There is no record of an embassy between Constantinople and Fustat in the period under consideration (946–956) and al-Mas’udi’s statement must refer to some envoy or messenger whose mission nothing more seems to be known.¹⁹⁵ There was, however, a ransoming of prisoners which took place in the port of Alexandria in the summer of 953,¹⁹⁶ and al-Mas’udi’s informants may have been among such envoys involved in the negotiations of this ransoming.

Al-Mas’udi’s details on these particular internal events in the Byzantine Empire are thus worth consideration as a non-Greek source of information and may be compared (not unfavourably) to the account of the Latin writer and ambassador Liutprand, Bishop of Cremona (wrote 955–962).¹⁹⁷ This contemporary author similarly obtained his information from an earlier Latin ambassador who was at Constantinople when some of these events took place.¹⁹⁸

It is interesting and important that most of al-Mas’udi’s details are remarkably accurate — for example the fact that Romanus’ two sons remained in power for about forty days after the deposition of their fathers;¹⁹⁹ that Romanus died after four years of monastic life;²⁰⁰ that father and sons spent their years of exile in three separate islands; and that Romanus was put in a monastery which he himself had built on an island quite near to Constantinople.²⁰¹

In addition to these details, a particular aspect of the fall of the Lecapeni is worth consideration. It is connected with the conspiracy of the two young Lecapeni co-emperors against their father. "Accounts differ as to how the intrigue started;\(^{209}\) writes Sir Steven Runciman in his study on the reign of Romanus Lecapenus: "later chroniclers, who for some reason disliked the Porphyrogenitus, accuse him of having incited the sons against their father; but ... such subtle villainy was very alien to his [Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus] amiable mildness."\(^{210}\) The contemporary Latin account preserved by Liutprand of Cremona goes as far as saying that the plot was "without the knowledge of Constantine Porphyrogenitus."\(^{211}\) Al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\)'s other hand states that "the two sons of Romanus conspired with (\textit{waq'a}) Constantine son of Leo to overthrow their own father,"\(^{212}\) and in fact his subsequent narrative may be taken to imply that the three actively participated in the execution of the plot with the support of others.\(^{213}\) It seems therefore that Constantine's implication in the plot against his father-in-law was not simply a product of later chroniclers. Al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\)'s remarks clearly contradict the statement of Liutprand of Cremona who depicts Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus as unaware of the plot of the two young Lecapendi. It is true that al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\)'s report does not actually describe Constantine VII as inciting his brothers-in-law against their own father. Nevertheless his words make it clear that the two young Lecapendi plotted against their father not only with the knowledge of the Prophogenitus but also with his connivance and possibly his active support.

Al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\)'s interest in Byzantine history was by no means confined to palace coupes or to internal political events alone. For he also gives considerable attention to the external relations of Byzantium with its neighbours and with other peoples. For the pre-Islamic period he gives details on Sasanian-Byzantine relations.\(^{214}\) For the period after the rise of Islam he not only deals with Arab-Byzantine relations, but also has something to say on the foreign policy of the Byzantines and their dealings with their neighbours such as the Bulgars, Khazars and Russians; and alludes to the Byzantine diplomatic position and influence in the West.

He refers for example to the relations with the Khazars and the Bulgars in connection with Justinian II's attempt to restore his throne, and states that the emperor had to pay a subsidy to Tarbel (\textit{Tarsus}) the King of the Bulgars.\(^{215}\) He accurately dates the outbreak of the war between Krum's Bulgaria and Byzantium in AH 193 (AD 809) and states that Nicephorus I was killed in battle during these wars.\(^{216}\)

More important however, is his knowledge of, and interest in, later developments on the northern frontiers of the Byzantine Empire connected with the attacks of the Bulgars under Symeon (893-927), and of the Magyars and other warlike Turkic peoples.\(^{217}\) However, al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\) at one point (in the \textit{Marīj}) confuses the Balkan Bulgars with the Bulgars of the Volga whose king had recently embraced Islam.\(^{218}\) The latter are credited with raiding deep into Byzantine territory and threatening Constantinople itself.\(^{219}\) Al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\) also speaks of contacts in 312/924 between Muslims of \textit{Tarsus} and the Bulgars who were engaged in fighting against the Byzantines. He states that in this year a Muslim flotilla reached a certain bay past the Hellespont where it encountered certain Bulgars who told the Muslim that the camp of their king was nearby, some Bulgars came with the Muslim boats to the port of \textit{Tarsus}.\(^{220}\) These contacts do not appear to have been reported by other Arabic sources.\(^{221}\) Al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\)'s confused account may be partly due to his reliance on some informants who may have seen fit to attribute such wide-reaching activity to the newly converted northern Bulgars. But in \textit{Tarsus} — where a number of his errors are corrected explicitly or implicitly as in this instance — al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\) states that the Bulgars who ravaged the Byzantine themes of Macedonia, Thessalonica and Thrace, and who also threatened the Byzantine capital were in fact Christians.\(^{222}\)

Al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\) also knew of the impact of the westward migrations of the Magyars and Pechenegs upon the Byzantine territories in the Balkans. He states that some time after 320/932 these tribes were able to ravage most of the European themes of the Empire; and that the menace of these raiders was considerable.\(^{223}\) He also knew that the Magyars raided far westward into other parts of Europe.\(^{224}\)

Al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\)'s knowledge also extended to contemporary Byzantine-Russian relations. He refers to certain naval attacks by the \textit{Rūsk} on Constantinople stating that the Byzantines took special precautions in the form of fortifications or barriers to prevent these northerners from sailing down the Bosphorus and reaching the capital.\(^{225}\) He knew, however, that there were also commercial relations between the Rusians and the Byzantines,\(^{226}\) and that certain Russians served in the imperial forces.\(^{227}\)

Of particular interest is his reference to the relations between Constantinople and the West. Al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\) speaks of the 'master of Rome' who, according to him, had long been subordinate to the 'master of Constantinople' even before the Islamic era and until about 340 (956), when this ruler, as al-Mas'\(\text{u}\)d\(\text{i}\) puts it, "put on the purple and assumed the imperial title" which led the Byzantine emperor to attempt waging war against him, though he eventually resolved to maintain peaceful relations with him. The identity of the 'master of Rome' can be established from al-Mas'ūdī's reference to a previous marriage alliance in which this ruler is said to have given his daughter as wife to Romanus, son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and that the bride died later in Constantinople. This is evidently an allusion to Hugh of Provence, who was not, of course, the master of Rome, but who in 944 betrothed his illegitimate daughter Bertha (Cudocia) to the Byzantine crown prince who became Romanus II. Al-Mas'ūdī's statement that this ruler was the first western king to become emperor is inaccurate; for apart from anything else, Hugh was in fact never crowned emperor. Nevertheless his account reflects his knowledge of Byzantine diplomatic activities in the West, especially Italy, during the reign of Romanus I Lecapenus and particularly after 944 under Constantine VII's personal rule.

Al-Mas'ūdī, as may be expected, paid considerable attention to Islamic-Byzantine relations. His information on this aspect has been utilised by a number of modern scholars and there is no need to dwell on its details here. It is necessary, however, to point to important aspects of his account especially certain episodes on which he offers details or views not to be found in earlier or contemporary Arabic sources.

Thanks to his several visits to the frontier region and his acquaintance with Muslim warriors and diplomats, al-Mas'ūdī was able to preserve interesting information on Arab-Byzantine warfare. An example of this is his rather detailed account of the siege and capture of Heraclea by Hārūn al-Rashīd in 803 AD. In addition to information based on literary traditions, al-Mas'ūdī gives two other independent traditions which he obtained from people of the Syrian marches - one of these from Abī 'Umār b. Abī al-Bāṣir who was among other qualities, well versed in the historical traditions of earlier Muslim wars against the Byzantines; and the second was based on oral information from a number of people from al-thughfūr. Two other important events in the Arab-Byzantine wars recorded by al-Mas'ūdī deserve particular attention; not only because his information on them is based on his contacts with Muslim warriors or inhabitants of the frontier, but also because these were two important contemporary events, one of them is not explicitly recorded, the other not mentioned at all by other Muslim writers of al-Mas'ūdī's age.

The first is the Sack of Thessalonica by the Muslim navy under the leadership of the Greek convert to Islam, Leo of Tripoli in 291/904. It is true that al-Ṭabarī mentions the sack by Leo of Tripoli of an important Byzantine sea-port, but its name and location are not accurately recorded. As a result of this confusion in Arabic sources it used to be thought by modern scholars, even by A A Vasiliev and M Camard, that the expedition against Thessalonica and its sacking by the Muslims in 904, was only known from Byzantine sources and was not recorded by Arab historians. H Grégoire, thanks to a very brief passage in al-Mas'ūdī's Tāhān, has shown that the 'attack on Attalia' recorded by al-Ṭabarī and others in fact relates to Leo of Tripoli's expedition against Thessalonica, which is well-known from Byzantine sources. This passage of the Tāhān not only shows that al-Mas'ūdī gives the correct name of Thessalonica (Sahmikā) but also that he realizes its importance and its location in the European theme of the same name. He writes of "the theme of Sahmikā, the town which Leo (Lūvn), the Chūlūm of Zarāf, conquered by sea in 290 (actually 291/904) in the Caliphate of al-Muktāfī; it is a great city built before Constantinople itself, by Alexander son of King Philip." In fact he already speaks of the expedition against Thessalonica in the Murūj, although the name is preserved in a corrupted form (Sahhiyya) in this earlier work.

It is noteworthy that al-Mas'ūdī not only realized the location of the sacked city but moreover indicates the sea-route followed by the Muslim war-ships. Other Arabic sources, the earliest of which being al-Ṭabarī's Tāhān, while giving details of the date and the outcome of campaign (in terms of victory, and abundant booty), say nothing about the beginnings or other details of this naval operation. Byzantine authors who give much fuller details on the actual siege and sacking of the city, also speak of the intentions of the Muslim admiral to attack Constantinople itself, and state that the Muslim navy actually entered the Hellespont, occupied Abydos, and after navigating for a distance in the sea of Marmara, suddenly turned round and sailed back arriving later at Thessalonica.

A passage in the Murūj actually reveals al-Mas'ūdī's knowledge of the early operations of the Muslim marines in this expedition - that they entered the Hellespont and the Sea of Marmara but had to make a speedy exit. What makes al-Mas'ūdī's remarks even more significant is the fact that he is quoting Muslim sailors who actually took part in this expedition. In his description of the Mediterranean and other seas connected with it, he writes:

I have heard it from more than one knowledgeable person among those who participated in the expedition against Thessalonica with the page (ṣūlūm) of Zarāfa [i.e. Leo of Tripoli] that having entered for quite a long distance into the Khalīf of Constantinople [Hellespont] they found that the water in this gulf receded and rose at certain times during daylight and at night, and that the ebb and tide were frequent; that there were towns and villages nearby, and a certain town [i.e. Abydos] near the entrance from the Mediterranean into the Khalīf. When they felt the decrease in the level of the water they started to pull out of it towards the Mediterranean.234

This passage does not seem to have hitherto attracted comment from modern scholars dealing with Byzantine-Muslim relations.235 Al-Mas′ūdī’s report is mainly concerned here as in few other places in his work, with a geographical problem, but nevertheless this deserves to be considered alongside Byzantine accounts as evidence from the Arab side for the operation of the Muslim fleet under Leo of Tripoli into the Hellespont and the Sea of Marmara.236 It is unfortunate that despite his acquaintance with the admiral Leo of Tripoli himself, and with a number of his crew, al-Mas′ūdī’s preserved works contain no further details on this expedition.

The second important event recorded by al-Mas′ūdī and not mentioned by contemporary Muslim authors is the siege of Edessa by the Byzantines under the general John Curcuas in 944, and their obtaining of the sacred towel on which the portrait of Christ was believed to be imprinted.237 The siege of Edessa which ended upon the delivery of the sacred towel in the summer of 332/944 is recorded by al-Mas′ūdī in the very same year. For in this year al-Mas′ūdī was writing the first edition of his Murūj and his account of Byzantine affairs in this book does not in fact extend beyond this year.238 Speaking of the famous Cathedral of Edessa which was rebuilt by Justinian, he states that:

there used to be in this church a towel (mashīl) venerated by Christians, for Jesus of Nazareth dried Himself with it after Baptism. This mashīl had been constantly transferred until it settled in the Church of Edessa. Under the duress of the Byzantine siege of Edessa in this year which is 332 the mashīl was handed over to them and they accepted a truce. The Byzantines were greatly overjoyed when they received it.239

In addition to his information on the Byzantine-Arab wars, al-Mas′ūdī gives particular consideration to non-military exchanges between the two worlds — although some of these were in fact peaceful sequels to previous military operations. Thus he devotes a separate chapter in the Tanbih for the ransomings of prisoners on the Byzantine-Syrian frontier during the ‘Abdī period and up to the last ransoming in his own lifetime.240 He also refers to espionage activities by Muslims in Byzantine lands and indicates that Muslim spies (Jawāsīs, sing. Jāsī) were apparently usually present in the Byzantine capital.241 His reference to commercial relations between the two worlds has already indicated above,242 to which may be added his mention of an annual spice market in the town of Augustopolis in Asia Minor on the route to Constantinople.243

Most important perhaps is al-Mas′ūdī’s special view of the Byzantines as a state, a civilization, and as a people; and his attitude towards this enemy and rival of the Islamic world. For although his general treatment reflects certain similar characteristics to his own treatment of other non-Muslim polities, the Byzantine Empire, in his view, represented a particular case which, for various reasons, deserved due attention.

This especial attention is not only implicitly reflected in his accounts but is explicitly reiterated. A most striking illustration of this special approach is his attempt to synchronize the reigns of successive Byzantine emperors with those of their contemporaneous Muslim Caliphs. Although he is sometimes inaccurate in this respect (which is probably due in part to his own miscalculations), the significance of his practice of synchronizing Islamic with Byzantine reigns lies in that it does not seem to have a surviving precedent in earlier Muslim (or even Christian Arabic) historians.

Certain Arabic historians (both Muslim and Christian) use this practice only in connection with pre-Islamic history, for example, synchronizing biblical and occasionally Persian, or Persian and Roman periods.244 Al-Mas′ūdī’s systematic use of this method for Islamic-Byzantine history is a clear example of his living interest in Byzantine history and his positive appreciation of its place in Muslim annals. Al-Mas′ūdī employs this method consistently in both the Murūj245 and Tanbih,246 covering the whole period from Heraclius (610–641 = part of the Prophet’s Ilh, and the caliphates of Abū Bakr and ‘Umar) right up to that of his own contemporaries: Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus (913–959, = corresponding to the later years of al-Muqtaṣir, the reigns of al-Qāhir, al-Raḍfī, al-Muṭāṣīfī, al-Muṣṭaṣfī and the early years of al-Muḍfī).
Similarly, al-Mas'ūdī takes account of the Calendar System and names of months of the Byzantines. 247 Although he speaks briefly of the Byzantine system of Chronology, he does state that, in common with other peoples (except Hebrews and Arabs) the Byzantines use the solar calendar year, 248 and they date events according to various eras (e.g., Creation, Alexander, Diocletian). 249 He also gives the Greek names of the twelve months of the year. 250

Al-Mas'ūdī's especial interest in the Byzantine Empire, its history and culture, cannot be separate from his profound interest in Christianity and Christians. For he realized that the history of the rise and eventual victory of Christianity was closely linked with Byzantine history. This awareness is reflected in his detailed account of this gradual triumph: his description of the first six Great Councils of the Church as important events in later Roman history; 251 and his appreciation of the position of the church in the Byzantine polity.

Al-Mas'ūdī viewed the Byzantine Church with the Patriarch of Constantinople at its head as a powerful institution with its administrative hierarchy and independent finances. He describes the Patriarch of Constantinople as:

The King of religious matters just as the emperor is the 'master of the sword' ... 'the master of the seat' [ie the Patriarch] is as it were, the partner (sharek) 252 of the Emperor, and none but he is considered as equal to him. The Emperor himself pays homage to none but him. When the Emperor sits he does so on a golden throne while the Patriarch sits on an iron throne; whereas the administration of revenues, the financing of war efforts and the payments for soldiers are under the emperor's control; the financing of endowments for churches and monasteries [for payments and upkeep] of bishops and monks as well as for other affairs of religion are under the Patriarch's jurisdiction. He has a representative (a deputy; ʿāmil) in every province similar to the emperor's deputy. 253

This description may be a rather superficial and distorted picture of the actual relationship between Emperor and Patriarch in the Byzantine Empire as now perceived by modern Byzantinists. It reflects an ideal—possibly derived ultimately from an ecclesiastical source—and obviously a static view of the position of the Patriarch and the Church in general; and al-Mas'ūdī's understanding of the situation would appear rather naïve in the light of modern appreciation of a flexible interdependence between State and Church within the Byzantine polity. Nevertheless his remarks have a special significance as he is describing the Christian Church in the Byzantine Empire as an important institution which had no equivalent in the Islamic experience. (To appreciate al-Mas'ūdī's position here, one only needs think for a moment of a non-Muslim, say a medieval Christian or a modern Westerner—commenting on the unfamiliar special link between the religious and the political, in classical Islam.)

Moreover, al-Mas'ūdī, who was well versed in Greek philosophy, took a particular interest in ancient Greek history. 254 Although he was aware of the difference between the ancient Greeks (al-ʿUmn) and the Byzantines (al-Rūm) he realized the historical, linguistic and cultural links between the two worlds. As indicated above, the traditional view among other Muslim authors was that the ancient Greeks not only lost their political power, but also their historical existence, at the hands of the Romans when Octavius (Augustus Caesar) conquered Egypt. 255 But unlike other Muslim writers, al-Mas'ūdī realized that the Greeks, despite the loss of their earlier sovereignty still formed an integral part of the Rūm, and make their own contribution to Roman-Byzantine culture in the same way as he considered the ancient Babylonians, for example, to have contributed to Persian civilization. 256 He states that "Greek learning which continued to flourish in the times of the ancient Greeks and early Romans, had been on the decline with the gradual triumph of Christianity." 257 This view probably originated in the circles of the pagan ʿAbān of Ḥarrān who remained faithful to ancient Greek philosophy and sciences and lamented their decline which they attributed to the influence of Christianity. 258 But al-Mas'ūdī observes, nevertheless, that the "legacy of Greek learning was still kept among Greek learned men and savants", 259 and that: "the Rūm in their language and literature followed the ancient Greeks although they could not equal them". 260 Thus he was aware of a certain cultural continuity. 261 The Byzantines, in al-Mas'ūdī's view represented an extension—albeit an inferior one—of a culture that was worth getting to know.

As a striking example of al-Mas'ūdī's awareness and appreciation of the survival of ancient learning among the Byzantines, it is possible to cite his remarks on the personality of the Byzantine Ambassador John Mysticus who arrived at Damascus in the month of Dhu'l-Ḥijja, 334/July, 946. 262 He describes this Byzantine dignitary as "a man of understanding, versed in the history of the kings of the Greek and Rūm and the philosophers who were their contemporaries: and was somewhat familiar with their [philosophical] views. 263

In fact, al-Masʿūdī more explicitly pronounces his appreciation of Byzantine civilization in a statement concerned with his special approach in the Tunīs. In this last and much compressed work he explains why he confined his treatment of non-Muslim peoples to the Kingdoms of the Persians, the ancient Greeks and the Rūm. This selective approach is justified on cultural grounds — "for the two kingdoms of the ancient Greeks (al-Yūnān) and the Rūm came next to the Persians in greatness and glory, moreover they [the ancient Greeks and Rūm] are gifted in various branches of philosophy and sciences as well as in remarkable art and admirable craftsmanship." 264

Furthermore, with his interest in the history of contemporary non-Muslim polities, he was aware of the special position of Byzantium as a political power, and as an empire of a long tradition of institutional and administrative organization. "The empire of the Rūm", he remarks, "is still to our own times in possession of firmly established institutions and highly organized administration (thūbatat al-rusūm mut-taṣāṣqat al-tadbīr). So we did not wish to omit its history from our book." 265

Al-Masʿūdī was naturally conscious of the danger which Byzantium represented to Islam. He realized that in his own times — first half of the tenth century — it was no longer the Rūm but the Muslims who were on the defensive. As a Muslim intellectual concerned for Islam, al-Masʿūdī laments the weak position of the Muslim world as a result of political fragmentation and other internal factors. In his view, this situation led, among other things, to strengthening the position of the Byzantines as shown by their "victories over the Muslims" and their "capture of many Muslim fortresses and towns." 266 Again he observes with a note of regret that "Muslim war vessels used to invade the Byzantines, but now it is the warships of the Rūm which attack the Muslim shores." 267

But this fact did not lead al-Masʿūdī to turn a blind eye, or to adopt an attitude of prejudice towards the neighbouring enemy of Islam. In this, he certainly stands as an exceptional man among his contemporaries, and perhaps not only among his contemporaries.
The Byzantines 265

15 Idem, Radd, pp 16 and 326
16 An attitude that was reciprocated by the Byzantines, see for example, J Meyendorff, "Byzantine Views of Islam", D O P, 18, 1964 pp 115-132
17 See Murš, para 734-772 and passim; Tanbih, pp 137-195 and passim
18 Murš, para 8 ff
19 Cf Fibrist, Fl, 144; (C), 207; Eng trans I, 315; see now the article of S M Stern, "Abbī 'Išāʾ ibn al-Masʿūdī's Chronography", in Islamic Philosophy and the Classical Tradition, (Presented to Richard Walzer, ed S M Stern, and others) Oxford, 1972, p 437 ff; also above Chapter IV
20 Murš, para 1293
21 Tanbih, pp 154-155
22 Ibd, p 154. The text in de Goeje's edition reads: Atahmiya but the variant A??anus is also given; Carra de Vaux, Livre de l'Avertissement, p 212, renders this as 'Athemio'.
23 E Honigmann, 'Notes sur trois passages d'al-Masʿūdī', AIPHOS, 12 (1952), (Mélanges Henri Grégoire, No 4), pp 175-179
24 Tanbih, p 155; cf Michael the Syrian, Chronique, (French trans by A Chabot), I, pp 1-2, 9, 17 and passim
25 See for example, Murš, para 1297 and passim; Tanbih pp 142, 156 and passim; see also above Chapter II
26 Murš, para 733: (ṭābâkaynā mīn chālika mā taʿatā lanā waṣḥūn)
27 Ibd, para 1395
28 Apart from the well known cases of extensive translations made for the purpose of study of philosophical and scientific works (for example works described in Ibn al-Nadīm's Fibrist as having been translated for the Arab philosopher Yaʿqūb al-Khallī), reference may be made to statements by Ḥamza al-Ifshāḥi, Tatrīkh (ed Gottwald), p 48; and al-Ībrāhīm al-Saydānī (quoted by F Kronkow, in Al-Nadīm's Commemoration Volume, p 186): see on this problem with special reference to Ottoman historians, B Lewis, 'The Use by Muslim Historians of non-Muslim Sources', Historians of the Middle East, p 185 ff
29 Tanbih, p 154; on Eutychius see Ibn Aībī Uṣaybīl, Ṭabaqāt al-Aṭṭibāl, II, p 86 ff; G Graf, G C A L, II, pp 32-38; F Nau, 'Eutychius', in D T H C, V, cols 1609-1611
30 See G Graf, op cit, II, p 38 ff
31 Eutychius, Anales, ed L Cheikhho, Carra de Vaux, and H Zayyat,
The Byzantines 267

Al-Mas'udi also mentions other Christian authorities of a strictly ecclesiastical nature, see Chapter VII, p. 292 ff.

For example Agapius whose work in its preserved form goes as far as the year 160 (776-7) mentions only ten reigns out of thirteen (between Heraclius and Leo IV, crowned 775 AD); thus omitting the second reign of Justinian II (705-711) and those of Leontius (695-8) and Philiippicus Bardanes (711-13), see K. al-'Uwānī, ed. Chéjikho, pp. 355-6. Similarly, Eutychius's work which ends in 328/398 does not mention all Byzantine emperors. Thus out of twenty-six reigns mentioned by al-Mas'udi (from the reign of Heraclius's sons to that of Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus, Eutychius mentions only eighteen: omitting the reign of Constantine IV (685-688), that of Philippius Bardanes (711-13), that of Irene (787-802), Michael I Rangabe (811-13), Leo V (813-820), and Michael II (820-829). Eutychius also ignores the second reign of Justinian II (705-711), and considers the rebel Artabasdes as an emperor; see Eutychius, Annales (ed. Chéjikho), Pt II, p. 40 ff.

For example, the addition of the names of two hypothetical emperors: a Constantine and a Theophilus instead of Michael I Rangabe and Leo V; cf. Murāji, para 770; Eutychius, Annales (Chéjikho), II, p. 40 ff.

Yassini, Thārhib (ed. Goffwaldt), pp. 70-79; cf. also al-Hūrij, Chronology, p. 97 ff (who copies this list from Yassini's work, adding that the list was originally copied by Wadī from a translation of a Greek list).

On Wadī, see above, Chapter II

This can be supported by the fact that Wadī's list as preserved by Yassini, Thārhib, p. 79 ff contains few chronological errors found also in the Murāji, para 770

See above, p. 247 ff

Thārhib, pp. 190-191

Thārhib, p. 196: (wa kāna dhī majallīn ʿil-l-thughūr); the above is perhaps a more accurate rendering than that of E W Brooks', 'Arabic Lists of the Byzantine Themes', JHS, 21 (1901), p. 69: "he had a post . . ."

A description of a typical raid is given by Qushuwa (probably after al-Jarāni?), see Kharaqā, BQA, VI, p. 255 ff.

Marquart, Streifzüge, p. xxvii, and pp. 28, 207, has suggested that al-Jarāni was (together with another prisoner of war - Kārin b Yahyā) the principle source from which the earlier Muslim geographers derived their information on the Byzantine Empire; see also Minorsky, Judaea, p. 418; and Krackhovský, AGL, p. 131 ff; Arabic trans., I, p. 134.

49 Tanbih, p. 190

50 Murūj, para 733

51 See for example, his statement in Murūj, para 886: "and this was always my practice with those countries that I have not reached".

52 Murūj, para 305–366, 739, 228, 715, 3201; Tanbih, p. 174

53 Murūj, para 306

54 Murūj, para 305 and para 739; Tanbih, p. 180.

55 Vasiliev-Canard, op cit., II, i, p. 163 (note 2), (citing Theophanes Continuatus, p. 366; Cedrenus, II, p. 261)

56 Murūj, para 305. On Leo's naval activities against the Byzantines in the early 10th century see Vasiliev-Canard, op cit., II, i, p. 163 ff and passim; see also above, pp 256–8

57 Murūj, para 305

58 See Vasiliev-Canard, II, i, 249, n. 1

60 Al-Kindi, Wulūt Mīr, ed R. Guest, I, p. 245; Vasiliev-Canard, II, i, p. 163

61 See above, p. 257

62 See above, p. 256–7

63 According to al-Mas'ūdī himself (who incidentally supplies most of our information on his career), Abū 'Umayr was already responsible for Adana in 288/900; see Murūj, para 3336

64 Tanbih, p. 193

65 Murūj, para 729; Tanbih, p. 194

67 See Tanbih, p. 194; and above, p. 252

68 Tanbih, p. 193, 194; cf also Miskawayh, Ṭārīkh al-Umara, ed Amedroz, I, pp 53–54; Vasiliev-Canard, Byzance et les Arabes, II, i, pp 238 ff; II, ii, pp 60–67. On Abū 'Umayr's embassies to Constantinople see Murūj, para 738; Vasiliev-Canard, op cit., II, i, pp 314–315; it has been suggested that Abū 'Umayr himself was the Arab envoy during the reign of Leo VI the Wise (886–912), mentioned by Byzantine sources as (the Old 'Abd al- tuo); see Vasiliev-Canard, op cit., II, i, pp 193 and 315, note 2; S De Sacy who first pointed out the name 'Abd al- tuo in Greek sources thought that it probably referred to Abū 'Umayr's grandfather — See Notice et Extraits, VIII (1809), p. 198; reprinted in Murūj, IX, p. 375; cf also Carra de Vaux, Livre de l'Avertissement, p. 162; note 1. It appears, however, that the envoy in question was most probably Abū 'Umayr's uncle — Abū l-Qāsim Yahyā b Ghānim b 'Abd al-Baqī who, as we know from other sources, was the Muslim representative in connection with the ransoming of prisoners in the autumn of 283/896; see al-Ṭabarī, Annales, III, p. 2153; Vasiliev-Canard, op cit., II, ii, p. 12; Abū 'Umayr himself was not yet old enough then. The suggestion that the reference is to Yahyā b 'Abd al-Baqī is also supported by a passage in the Murūj (para 3201) in which he is described as a Muslim war-hero well-known to the Byzantines.

69 See Murūj, para 760; and see above, p. 256

71 See above, p. 251 ff

72 Tanbih, p. 194

73 See Murūj, para 895

74 Tanbih, p. 194; see above, pp 251–2

75 See F. Dölger, Regesta, I, No 653; (Curzaus is, in any case, known to have fallen from authority in 944; cf Runciman, Romanus Lecapenus, pp 69 and 235; H Grégoire, 'The Amorians and the Macedonians, C M H*, II, p. 143)

76 Runciman, op cit., pp 68, 91

77 Ibid., p. 68

78 Murūj, para 228

79 Ibid., para 3291

80 Tanbih, p. 174

81 Tanbih, p. 158

82 Murūj, para 715; Tanbih, p. 123; cf above, Chapters IV, V

83 Murūj, para 715

84 Tanbih, p. 123

85 The text in Tanbih, (p. 176) has: 'Urmānīya; (cf 'Urmānīs for Romanus), eg Muruj, para 770 ff; Tanab, pp 172-174, 193

Tanab, pp 176-177

Cf E W Brooks, 'Arabic lists of Byzantine themes', J H S, 21 (1901), p 67 ff; V Minorsky, Hadd, p 418 ff; cf also A Pertuis's commentary in his new edition of Constantino Porphyrogenitus de Thematisibus, see his table No 1 where the editor compares the lists of Ibn Khurradadbeh and Qudama but ignores that of Ibn Mas'ud. Ibn al-Faqih's list is very close to that of Ibn Khurradadbeh is only preserved in Yaqut, see Buldin, II, p 863 ff.

On this term originally derived from the Latin bandum see Du Cange, Glossarium Graecitatis, I, p 173. Arabic lexicographers considered the word 'band' as borrowed from the Persian, meaning "a banner of a military commander of ten thousand troops", see al-Jawaiq, al-Mu'arrab min kalamin al-'Arab, p 34; cf L A, sv Tanab, p 172 ff; other Arabic geographers use the term 'amal to describe a Byzantine military province regardless of its rank.

Some scholars have suggested that the Syrian Ajnad "recovert" the Byzantine theme, see G Wiet, Les pays de Yaqut, Leiden, 1937, p 169; cf also M Gaudroy-Demouny and S F Platonov, Le Monde musulman et byzantin jusqu'aux croisades, p 216; cf however M Canard's different view in A A Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, II, I, p 400, note 1, where it is argued that Byzantine Syria did not know the theme system. (The problem is still being debated.)

See Ibn Khurradadbeh, p 100-13; Qudama, pp 252-60; Ibn al-Faqih (in Yaqut, Buldin, II, p 863); of Minorsky, Hadd, para 42 and p 418 ff; Brooks, op cit, p 67 ff.

Tanab, p 179

Brooks, op cit, p 69: Banfajiyya most probably corresponds to Pamphylias, cf Vasiliev-Canard, Byzance et les Arabes, II, II, p 401 (note 2.)

See below (note 97)

Tanab, p 130

See for example Ibn Khurradadbeh, p 100; Qudama, p 255; Yaqut Buldin, II, p 863, (quoting Ibn al-Faqih); Brooks, op cit, pp 71-72

See H Grégoire 'Le Thème byzantine de Tafla-Tablian', Nouvelle Clio, 4 (1952), p 388 ff; cf Ostrogorsky, op cit, p 194, note 1; also A Tuyombey, Constantine Porphyrogenitus and His World, OUP, 1973, p 273

98 Ostrogorsky, op cit, p 247, note 4: "for no apparent reason", but both are mentioned in other Byzantine sources; cf Tuyombey, op cit, p 255

99 See G Ostrogorsky, op cit, pp 247-248

101 G Ostrogorsky, op cit, p 247; for later changes and the decline of the system see Ibid, pp 311-330, 332 et passim

103 See Ibn Khurradadbeh, p 100; Qudama, p 255; Ibn al-Faqih (in Yaqut, Buldin, II, p 863); of also Hadd, para 42 and p 418 ff; of Brooks, 'Arabic Lists of Byzantine Themes', p 70 ff

104 Constantine Porphyrogenitus, DAI, C 49/13; for the mention of the Peloponnisos as a theme, cf G Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, p 194, notes 2 and 4

105 See G Ostrogorsky, op cit, p 207; of the description of Ibn Khurradadbeh, p 100 ff; Ibn al-Faqih (Yaqut, Buldin, II, p 863 ff); Brooks, op cit, p 75

106 In fact Cappadocia is described as a theme (under a strategos) as early as 863; and Charanion is thought to have become a theme by 873, see Ostrogorsky, op cit, p 247

107 Ostrogorsky, op cit, p 70

108 Tanab, pp 139-141 (This needs a separate discussion)

109 See above however, p 244, for an exception

110 Muruj, para 739

111 Muruj, para 279, 293, 738; Tanab, p 139. Other Arabic geographers on the other hand took it for granted that the current came from the Black Sea; cf for example Ibn Khurradadbeh, p 103; Ibn al-Faqih, p 145

112 See G Levi Della Vida, 'Constantinopoli nella tradizione Islamica',

122 Murūr, para 729, 739; Tahanū, p 139. In the Murūr, para 739, he records the erroneous view of some Muslim authors that the city was bound by the sea from two sides. Cf corrections in Tahanū, loc cit: "others claim that the Khalif forms its boundaries on two sides"; cf Ibn Khurradadhbeh, p 104; cf al-Maqdisī (Abūn al-Taqāṣīm, B.G.A, III, p 147), who states that it is bound by the sea on one side only.

123 Tahanū, p 138; also p 31, where he mentions Arūsī/Arubī as one of three continents according to the opinion of Greek and Roman scholars; cf Ibn Khurradadhbeh, p 156; cf on this E Lewis, 'The Muslim Discovery of Europe', B.S.O.A.S, XX (1957), p 498 ff; J Lewicki, 'L'apport des sources arabes médiévales (IXe - Xe siècle) à la connaissance de l'Europe Centrale et Orientale', L'Occident e l'Islam nell'alto medioevo. I, Spoleto, 1965, p 461 ff esp p 464, see above, Chapter V

124 Murūr, para 740

125 Murūr, loc cit; cf Ibn Khurradadhbeh, p 105: "hundred gates"; Constantinople actually had about thirty gates; cf R Janin, Constantinople Byzantine, passim

126 Murūr, loc cit; cf Ibn Khurradadhbeh, p 105

127 Murūr, loc cit

128 Ibid

129 Cf on these R Janin, Constantinople Byzantine; idem in R.E.B. IX (1951), p 144 ff; idem, La géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin, Pt I, Vol 3: Les églises et les monastères, Paris, 1953

130 Murūr, para 740; Tahanū, p 142

131 See Murūr, para 717-733; Tahanū, pp 122-137

132 Murūr, para 734-754; Tahanū, pp 137-156

133 Murūr, Chapter 30, para 755-772

134 Tahanū, pp 156-159

135 Cf Tahanū, pp 137-156; cf for example V Grumel, La Chronologie, pp 356-358. There are however minor discrepancies in al-Mas'ūdī's list in Murūr (para 734 ff) which he shares with his contemporary Christian historians Eutychius and Agapetus. Like them he omits the name of Basilicus (475-8) and the second but longer reign of Zeno (476-91); but he does however realize that this latter returned to the
Which he however wrongly ascribes to the reign of Constans II (641–685); Ibd., pp 156–58; cf Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, p 127 ff

Other Muslim writers relate few such anecdotes; but these are often presented as instructive stories without mentioning names or dates, see for example, B Lewis, 'An Arabic Account of a Byzantine Palace Revolution', Byzantion, XIV (1939), pp 383–6 (from Ibn al-Dayy's, al-Muqāfī's)

Al-Mas'ūdī says that Heraclius came with his fleet from the city of Thessalonica and that he was formerly a patrician in some island; on this last point he is following Eutychius, p 219; Heraclius was actually the son of the Byzantine governor of North Africa. Al-Mas'ūdī's mention of Thessalonica may be explained by the fact that Heraclius may have called at this important port on his way to Constantinople; see Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, p 85

(These details are not mentioned by Eutychius or Agapius)

The reign of Irene is not included at all in the works of either Eutychius or Agapius.

For the Śahāīm, see Chapter VII, below

For example, he states that Anastasius I (491–518) adopted the Monophysite creed of the Jacobites who were later to be persecuted under his successors Justin I (518–27) and Justinian I (527–565); cf Tanbih, p 150–153

Loc cit

Tanbih, pp 137–138; cf J B Segal, Edessa 'the Blessed City', p 51 (note 5)

Tanbih, pp 145–146; cf Muruj, para 744, where al-Mas'ūdī states that he was called "the pagan (al-Hānikā) and (al-Dufūṣi)"; cf Eutychius, Annales, p 137, who calls Julian "the infidel: (al-Kafir)"; and Agapius, p 297, who describes him as "the hypocrite: (al-Munāfiq)". On Julian's connection with the Śahāīm of Harrān, see J B Segal, 'Mesopotamian Communities from Julian to the Rise of Islam', Proced Brit Acad., XL (1965), p 109 ff; idem, Edessa 'the Blessed City', p 104 and passim

Of Tanbih, p 156 ff with Grumel, Chronologie, p 359 ff

Muruj, para 735

See above, p 256

Tanbih, pp 156–158

See especially vol I, pp xxx ff; of illustrations in C M H, IV, ii, plate 42 and notes by P D Whitting, pp xxxix-x-xxxx.

165 Tanbih, pp 167-168; cf Tabari, Annales, sec III/Pt ii, p 695; E W Brooks, 'Byzantines and Arabs in the Time of the Early Abbasids', E H R (1900), p 743. The view that Nicephorus was of Arab origin has been accepted by a number of modern scholars, see for example A A Vasilev, History of the Byzantine Empire, (Madison, 1958), p 271 and p 273; M V Amantos, 'Iconoclasm and Imperial Rule, 717-842', C M H, IV, i, p 91

166 Tanbih, p 168: the word 'Saracen' is known to have been given popular etymology by the Byzantines which meant "those whom Sara sent away empty-handed"; see E Honigman, in A P H O S, XII (1953), p 178 ff; see now V Christides, 'The Names Sarakessoi, Sarakessoi, etc, and their false Byzantine Etymologies', P R, 65 (1972), pp 329-333

167 Tanbih, p 168

168 Ibid, loc cit

169 For example, Justinian II (705-711) is known to have appointed his son as co-emperor and heir apparent, although his son was killed with him; it is also known that Leo III (717-741) had his own son and heir presumptive crowned as co-emperor, and that the so-called Ecloga Isaurorum was published jointly under the names of the Emperors Leo and Constantine; cf G Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, p 142 and p 158; English translation of the Ecloga by E H Freshfield, A Manual of Roman Law, the Ecloga Published by the Emperors Leo III and Constantine V of Isauria, (Cambridge, 1826)

170 Tanbih, p 168

171 On this conflict see for example W Ohnseorge, Das Zweikaiser - problem im früheren Mittelalter, Hildesheim, 1947; idem, Abendland und Byzanz, (Darmstadt, 1958), pp 1-45 and 64 ff and G Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, p 182 ff

172 See on this G Ostrogorsky, 'The Byzantine Emperor and the Hierarchical World Order', Slavonic and East European Review, XXXV (1936), pp 1-14; idem, History of the Byzantine State, p 189

173 See G Ostrogorsky, op cit, p 199 (note 5), and the literature cited there. The source of al-Mas'udi's statement is not known, and it may be that this, together with other traditions concerning Nicephorus (the emperor of supposedly Arab origin), were known to some circles in the frontier region or derived from some Christian Arab source that has not survived.

174 Tanbih, pp 165-166

175 Tanbih, p 169

176 See G Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, p 203

177 Tanbih, p 171: French translation by Carra de Vaux, p 233 ff; reproduced with some modifications by M Canard in A A Vasilev, Byzance et les Arabes, vol II, Pt ii, p 355 ff

178 This is evidently a reference to 'Theophillites - a favourite of the Emperor Michael who first took Basil as chief of the ecclesiaries or proctorates'; see H Grégoire, 'The Amorians and Macedonians 843-1025', C M H, IV, i, p 116

179 Tanbih, p 171

181 Tanbih, p 171; Carra de Vaux, p 233, followed by Canard, in Byzance et les Arabes, II, i, p 396, n.1; renders this as 'administrateur de l'empire'; J E Dunlap, The Office of the Grand Chamberlain in the later Roman and Byzantine Empires, New York, 1924, esp p 260 ff; H Grégoire, in C M H, IV, i, p 116 ff

182 Tanbih, p 171; cf al-Tabari, Annales (ed de Goeje), III, pp 1858-9 and pp 2026, 2105; Byzance et les Arabes, II, ii, p 6 and pp 8, 9, Al-Tabari, however, to derogate the emperor calls him 'the son of the Slave woman (Iba al-Salabiyya))'.

183 Tanbih, p 171; Byzance et les Arabes, II, ii, p 395; the ethnic origins of Basil I called 'The Macedonian' have been a topic of controversy among scholars - he is thought by some to have been an Armenian; see N Adontz, Byzantion, IX (1924), p 223 ff; S Nersessian, Armenia and the Byzantine Empire, p 29 (where Basil is described as 'of Armenian parents'); also H Grégoire, CMH, IV, i, p 116; but this is by no means certain; see Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State p 232, note 1; A A Vasilev, History of the Byzantine Empire, p 301, suggests that 'Basil was of mixed Armenian-Slavonic origin'. Most scholars, however, would accept the view presented in al-Mas'udi's account and in other (non-Arabic) sources that Basil's family was settled in Thrace probably in the region of Adrianople; see G Ostrosgorsky, loc cit, and H Grégoire, loc cit.

184 Tamūh, p 171

185 Murūj, para 771-2; part of this passage is translated into French in Vasiliye-Canar, Byzance et les Arabes, II, ii, p 39

186 See Tamūh, pp 172-174; Vasiliye-Canar, Byzance et les Arabes, II, ii, pp 386-388; for an account of these events based on Greek sources (and also on a Latin testimony) see S Runciman, The Emperor Romanus Lecapenus and his Reign, Cambridge, 1929, esp pp 55-68 and pp 229-237; cf also A Rambaud, L'Empire Grec au Xme Siècle: Constantin Porphyrogenitus, Paris, 1976, esp p 18 ff;

187 See above

188 A detailed account on the reception by the Emperor of an important Arab ambassador who came in the month of May, 946, on behalf of the emir of Tarṣūs is mentioned by Constantine Porphyrogenitus himself in the Book of Ceremonies (ed J J Reiske, C S H B, 1829-40, p 570 ff; cf Vasiliye-Canar, Byzance et les Arabes, II, 1, p 314 (note 3)

189 Cf above, p 236 ff

190 Abū 'Umayr himself died four years after that, (537/948) - see Muhammad b Zabr al-Rab'I, Tārikh Mawlid al-'Ullamā wa-waabāthim, Brit Mus Ms Or 1019, folio 49v

191 Cf S Runciman, Romanus Lecapenus, p 236; see below, n. 201

192 Al-Masʿūdī accurately states that Constantine Lecapenus tried to kill his chief gaoler, and was himself killed by other keepers of the prison; Tamūh, p 173; Vasiliye-Canar, Byzance et les Arabes, II, ii, p 388; cf S Runciman, Romanus Lecapenus, p 235

193 Stephen died much later after spending nineteen years in exile; cf S Runciman, op cit, p 236

194 Tamūh, p 173; Vasiliye-Canar, op cit, II, ii, p 398

195 See Vasiliye-Canar, Byzance et les Arabes, II, i, p 311 ff; and chronological table, pp 385-6

196 Ibid, II, i, p 395

197 See Liutprand, Bishop of Cremona, Antapodosis, ed I Bekker, in Scriptores rerum Germaniiorum in usum scholaram (1815); V, p 142 ff; English translation by F A Wright, The Works of Liutprand of Cremona, London, 1930, pp 189-194

198 Liutprand obtained his account from the Provençal Ambassador, Bishop Siegfried; Liutprand himself arrived in Constantinople on his first diplomatic mission in 948; cf Wright's introduction; also Runciman, op cit, p 233 (note 1)

199 Tamūh, p 173; Runciman, Romanus Lecapenus, pp 232-233; the two young Lecapeni were actually arrested and exiled on 27th January, 945, just about forty days after their father's downfall which Runciman dates on 20th December 944 (but H Grégoire gives as 16th December; cf C M H, IV, i, p 143)

200 Romanus died on 15th June 948; cf Runciman, op cit, p 236 (citing Theophanes Continuatus, pp 400-1)

201 Romanus was exiled to the island of Prote, the nearest of the Princes Islands to Constantinople. According to Byzantine sources and to Bishop Liutprand, however, the two young Lecapeni were first taken to see their father on this island; Stephen was then sent on to prison at Proocenomenes and later was moved to Rhodes, then Mitylene; Constantin was taken to Tenedos and then to Samothrace; see Theophanes Continuatus, p 437; Liutprand, Antapodosis, pp 143-44; Eng trans p 190 ff; Runciman, op cit, pp 232, 234

202 Romanus Lecapenus, p 233; citing George Cedrenus, Synopsis Historiae, C S H B, 1838-9, II, p 32 ff

203 Liutprand, op cit, p 142 ff; Eng trans, p 190

204 Tamūh, p 173

205 Ibd., al-Masʿūdī writes of the imperial plotter in the plural and not in the dual which he only employs to describe the later unsuccessful attempt of Stephen and his brother against the Prophrygenitus; some of the officials alluded to as helpers in the plot, are named in Byzantine sources; see Runciman, op cit, p 232

206 Murūj, para 665 ff; 666, 657 ff; 754; Tamūh, pp 143-145, 155-157

207 Tamūh, p 164; cf Ostrosgorsky, History of the Byzantine State, p 142

208 Tamūh, p 168; G Ostrosgorsky, op cit, p 196 (Neophorus was killed by the Bulgars in 811)

209 Murūj, para 456 and 433 ff; Tamūh, pp 180, 183; cf Vasiliye-Canar, Byzance et les Arabes, II, ii, p 32 and pp 33-35 (and notes)

210 Murūj, para 455 ff; Vasiliye-Canar, op cit, II, ii, p 32; see also Chapter V

211 Murūj, para 455-6; see above Chapter V

212 Murūj, loc cit; Vasiliye-Canar, II, ii, pp 32-3

213 Cf however, Vasiliye-Canar, II, i, p 251 ff; and Canard, 'Arabes et Bulgares au début du Xe siècle', Byzantion, XI (1938), pp 213-223

As Grégoire (op cit p 377) points out, the probability that Tabari's account actually referred to Thessalonica was already suggested by D Weil, Geschichte der Chalifen, II, (Stuttgart, 1848), pp 532-3 (in Weil's History, see D M Dunlop, 'Some remarks on Weil's 'History of the Caliphs', in B Lewis and P M Holt, Historians of the Middle East, pp 315-329); cf see now the discussion of this expedition by M Canard in Byzance et les Arabes, II, p 163 ff.

229 See above, p 246.

232 The 'classic' Byzantine account of the sack of Thessalonica is that by John Camenitès, De exordio Thessaloniconis, ed I Bokker (at the end of Theophanes Continuatus, Chronographia, V, Bonn, 1838, p 491 B); cf H Ahrweiler, Byzance et la mer, pp 104-105.

233 See further in Vasiliev-Canard, op cit, II, i, p 164 (notes 1 and 2).

234 Tabari, para 739.

235 Although it is included in the extracts from Arabic sources in Vasiliev-Canard, op cit, II, ii, p 38, this report is not considered in the discussion (amplified and updated by M Canard) of Byzance et les Arabes, II, i, p 163 ff; similarly H Grégoire who quotes the beginning of this report (cf 'Lo Communiqué arabe sur la prise de Thessalonique (904)', Byzantion, 22 (1952), p 373) does not, however, extend his study to the question discussed here.

236 Al-Mas'udi does not tell us why the Muslim ships hastily abandoned the Sea of Marmara but he seems to imply that this was partly due to the shallowness of the water.

237 Tabari, para 753; on this relic and its significance for Christians see, among other works, S Runciman, 'Some remarks on the image of Edessa', Cambridge Historical Journal, 1931, p 238 ff; idem, Romanus Lecapenus, pp 145, 229-230; L Bréhier, Icones non faîtes de main d'homme, Rev. archéologique, 1832, p 168 ff; J B Segal, Edessa 'the Blessed City', pp 76-78, 178, 204, 214 and passim.

238 See above.

239 Tabari, para 753. This passage is not included among the extracts in Vasiliev-Canard, Byzance et les Arabes; the siege of Edessa by the Byzantines and their obtaining of the 'sacred towel' is described by the eleventh century Christian Arabic historian Yahyā b Saʿīd of Antioch, see Annales (ed and trans by A A Vasiliev), P. O. XVIII, pp 32-35; Beirut ed (by L Cheikho and others), pp 98, 99; and later by Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VIII, pp 302-303; cf Vasiliev-Canard, Byzance et les Arabes, II, ii, pp 91-93 and pp 156-157; see the detailed account in Vol II, Pt 1, pp 296-303; cf S Runciman, Romanus Lecapenus, pp 144-145; and also the brief remarks in J B Segal, Edessas, p 214

240 Tanbih, pp 192-196; Vasiliev-Canard, Byzance et les Arabes, II, ii, pp 406-408; some of these are mentioned in Taβarī and other Arabic sources, but not in the same systematic manner or as a separate account.

241 See Murūj, para 3293 ff; of M Canard, 'Djásus', in El2

242 See above, pp 235, 253

243 Tanbih, p 177

244 See for example, al-Tabarī, Annales, I, pp 201, 206, 693, 702 and passim; al-Dinawarī, Akhbār (ed Guirgass), p 53 ff; al-Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, I, p 95 ff; Eutychius, Annales (ed Cheikho), I, p 88 ff; Agapius, al-ʿUnwān, passim

245 See Murūj, para 755 ff

246 Tanbih, pp 156-158 and pp 164-174

247 Murūj, para 1297 ff; Tanbih, p 196 ff

248 Tanbih, p 214

249 Ibid, pp 197-198

250 Murūj, para 1297

251 See also Chapter VII

252 Tanbih, p 172

253 Ibid, pp 172-173; Vasiliev-Canard, Byzance et les Arabes, II, ii, p 397

254 Greek political history according to al-Masʿūdī and other Muslim historians begins with the Macedonian kingdom of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, and ends with the death of Cleopatra. See above, Chapter IV

255 See above, Chapter IV

256 Murūj, II, para 741; Tanbih, pp 7, 182; cf for example the opposite views of al-Jaḥīṣ and al-Yaʿqūbī

257 Murūj, para 741

259 Murūj, para 797; cf the opinion of al-Yaʿqūbī, Historiae, I, p 164; and Marvazī, (see Minorsky, in AIPHOS, 12 (1954), p 458 ff)